Tip #8: Learning Opportunities Can Promote Bonding

TIP #8 Learning Opportunities Can Promote Bonding

Winter breaks & time indoors can provide opportunities for families to strengthen bonds while keeping the process of learning alive. Mindfully incorporating educational activities into daily life can help foster cognitive, social, emotional, creative, & both intrapersonal & interpersonal growth.

Learning during Winter break does not need to be formal. Children need to be guided & shown that their lives are full opportunities to be creative & curious. Before you know it, they will be learning --- for the fun of it!

Who says learning can't be fun? Here are some great ways for parents to foster learning without kids even knowing they are learning!

- * Bake some cookies or start a family cooking night! Discuss vocabulary used to describe the processes of cooking & baking; use your senses to explore different ingredients & their tastes or functions; utilize sequencing adverbs like "first" or "next" to give instructions; explore different instruments & tools used to measure & create culinary delights. Engage children in exploring the concepts of fractions & proportions as you measure ingredients. Talk about how physical & chemical changes take place to transform ingredients into finished products. Write down your child's favorite recipes together & have your child illustrate the steps. Talk making mistakes & how we can learn from them.
- * Begin a yoga or Pilates routine with your family. Help children to see that there is a connection to humans & nature. Help them explore how we can learn from animals & that learning to understand our own bodies more. Pilates was inspired by the behavior of cats, they are still very muscular & fit despite rather 'lazy' days. Simple tasks in daily life can help keep our bodies & minds fit.
